[...] More on the topic of Rick and Morty, written by Ryan Elder Read more: GettyIt was only a matter of time before more sophisticated fake videos surfaced on the Internet. But the crackdown on this super-realistic fake is already beginning. Reddit and Glycat, two popular platforms where users download fake, have begun to eradicate the manipulated smut that is often so convincing that it blurs the contours of reality itself. This type of fake, also called deepfakes, involves displaying someone else's face on the body of a star. While fake has existed for years, free and more powerful tools using artificial intelligence now allow trolls a way to create more realistic videos, given that they have enough images of their victim to recreate the scene. Deepfakes subreddit dedicated to this type of content has thousands of users who often use celebrity faces, although the practice has also evolved to include classmates and former partners. This is often done without human permission. As Next Web noted on Wednesday, some of these videos and GIFs are removed from some of the more popular sites hosting them after news outlets began reporting trends. I just noticed that my download yesterday was removed, may be a copyright issue. a Reddit user wrote, according to Next Web. I don't think it's copyright, since random Japanese idols with virtually minimal presence in the West have been removed, another redditor has reportedly written: These are unfortunate ones that bear no resemblance to any person gone. This suggests that someone from Glycat pre-emptively removed all the gifs associated here. Another Redditor posted to Deepfakes last night, claiming that old Glycat links had been removed from the site. targeted cleaning, so people should avoid using the website, they wrote. Anyone who has posted the link before should try re-hosting as well. G/O Media Media Receiving commissionIn a statement emailed by Gizmodo, Glycat confirmed that it is actively cleaning up its deepfakes platform. Glycat's terms of service do not have a clear policy regarding revenge, but it prohibits any content that is illegal, harmful, threatening, offensive, offensive, peaty, overly violent, defamatory, vulgar, obscene, defamatory, invasive to other privacy, racially hateful, ethnically or otherwise undesirable. A spokesman for the company said the deep action clearly violated the site's rules. Our terms of service allow us to remove content that we consider undesirable, a Glycat spokesperson said. We consider this content undesirable and actively remove it from our platform. Reddit has not yet responded to our request for comment, but deepfakes is likely violating the terms of service of the site as well. Reddit clearly states that unwanted content includes posting photos, videos or digital images of any person in a state of nudity or engaging in any act of sexual behavior taken or posted without their permission. Of course, the whole thing is complicated by the fact that naked bodies in deep do not belong to people whose faces are tied to them. Fake videos are not just harassment and gross invasion of privacy, they probably violate copyright laws. To create deep-rooted, someone will need hundreds of images of their victim. To collect them, they can use an open source photo-scratch tool that will capture photos of their victim that are available online. But this victim can request the removal of these images if they are posted without their permission, citing copyright infringement. Both Reddit and Glycat have a copyright infringement policy that says they will remove offensive content. Just as advanced fake was a predictable result of our reality trolls, so was the inevitable reaction and the police. And trolls are already trying to figure out which platforms they can flock to next, posing alternative sites like Russian social networks vk.com and ok.ru for those worried about their videos being removed. It's a vicious cycle, and it's no surprise. When the latest technological gadgets have appeared on the market, suddenly your computer and smartphone seem sad and useless. So you decide to sell your outdated payment devices to offset the cost of miracle machines touted in the media. But what are you really selling to a guy from Craigslist you're dating at a McDonald's on the street? Answer: Literally everything you have on your computer, including your massive alphabetical cache (both by category and actor's name, no less). You may think you got rid of all the dirty secrets on this computer you plan to sell, but you probably a few things. And I need to know, because I'm the guy who cleans him. My job is basically to be a computer janitor. I mostly work freelance on Craigslist and other internet sites to buy second-hand and broken broken I cleaned and sold a few dozen computers and I came across a lot of. I mean a lot. Not to mention the personal information that people leave behind, including in one case the entire database of the local law office. Before you give away or sell another computer, follow these simple steps to make sure you have protected your identity and your dignity. No saved files I can't tell you how many times I found a few files absolutely filled with. The most horrific is the fact that no one has even tried to hide the file. Let's be clear: no matter where you put your personal slap pot, I'll find it. But it's still nice to see a bit of effort gone into hiding it, not with it sitting right under the my papers tab. One day, I even found a sex contract detailing all the disgusting things a sex slave is expected to do, including salad tossing, slapping scribbles, and clogging cavities. I could barely read the squid playing position. There are several sites to access this content for free, which makes keeping it on your hard drive pointless. I know you know what sites it is. I looked at your browser history. And speaking of... Delete browser history This simple task is overlooked too often. Are people just in such a hurry to unload their computers and make a quick fifty bucks that they don't have a few minutes to cover their online tracks? It's not just sites that you've visited that can get pretty weird. (We tried to warn you, internet got so much weirder than you could have imagined.) It's also something that seems harmless. Browsing habits give a lot of personal data away, such as Facebook profiles and email accounts. By the time you get home, I could've posted the contents of that one folder you told your girlfriend you promised you would delete right on the Facebook wall. And that creepy uncle from one family reunion? He's already liked it. Make sure you hit all your internet browsers. A typical computer has more than one, each with its own bookmarks and history. Even if Google Chrome is your browser of choice, who knows what Grandma looked at once she lent a computer and opened Internet Explorer. Erase the drive There are different ways to delete data on the hard drive. Since your data is stored magnetically, you can use the same technology to erase the hard drive as well. Remember that degaussing machine you bought last year because you couldn't pass that $20K deal at Walmart? Now you can put it to use! Just pop ol' grumble drive into one of the slots and it does the job for you. You don't have access to a degaussing machine? Simply use the welder magnet to pass over the disk several times in the same direction. Darik's Boot and Nuke (DBAN) is another alternative. DBAN is very powerful (and an application to remove sections on the hard drive, making it useless until it is properly formatted. For you nerd readers out there, it's equivalent to cleaning up these mysterious stains found all over these hard towels by just throwing them. (Seriously, throw them away. This method is not 100% effective, since someone with proper software and time can recover these deleted files. If you want to be very careful, the best thing is ... Hammer Shit from your drive is not only it's safe, it's also the most interesting way to make sure that no one can access the content of your personal shame. Just make sure you first remove the drive from your computer before you start playing wack-a-byte. Then, peek it open with your favorite hammer. Inside you should see a flawless reflective disk. Gently remove this disc with a hammer, place it on the ground and then use the said hammer to turn this disk into fine dust. Snoring this dust does not give direct transmission of to your brain, so please don't try this. Keep the drive depending on how much sensitive (porn) data you have on your drive, it would be helpful to just save the drive for yourself. You can even buy adapters to turn this drive into usb storage to download even more on. It's a win-win situation! This method can affect the sale price, but is there really a price for personal security? Or for your detailed collection of interracial dwarf faces sitting photos? (It's not just the computers that you give that put you in danger. Here are some pointers on how to protect yourself from evil hackers.)
